Social Practice: Arranged Marriage Description

Arranged marriage is a common social practice in Pakistan where parents and families help choose a suitable partner for their children. Families consider factors like religion, family background, education, and financial status before agreeing on the marriage. Usually, the bride and groom meet after the proposal and then families decide whether to proceed.

Purpose

The main purpose of arranged marriage is to create a stable family and maintain cultural and family values. It also helps build strong relationships between two Families.

Actors

Bride and Groom - the people getting married

Parents - they usually find and suggest the match

Relatives - help in finding proposals

Matchmakers or community members - sometimes help connect families

Functionalist Perspective

Functionalists believe that social practices help maintain order and stability in society.

Manifest Functions (Intended results)

Creates stable families

Maintains cultural traditions

Strengthens relationships between families

Latent Functions (Unintended results)

Expands social connections between families

Provides emotional and financial support

Dysfunction

Conflict Perspective

Karl Marx / Marxist Point of View

According to Marxist theory, arranged marriage can help families maintain their social class and economic status by marrying within the same class.

Feminist Point of View

From a feminist perspective, arranged marriage can sometimes limit women's independence and choice, because families may have more control over the decision.
